When individuals find that their abilities have been diminished or limited by certain mental and physical conditions, a host of questions arise after the diagnosis. Can your clients keep their home if Medicaid assistance is required? Is additional in-home care needed, and if so, what are the best practices for securing a qualified caregiver? What if a family member agrees to be the caregiver in return for a future payment in the form of a larger share of your client's estate? This seminar explores these questions and others, including a prospective client's capacity to retain an attorney, Medicaid planning in protective proceedings, and a look at recent legislation that affects elder law practitioners and their clients. Legal ethics concerns particular to an elder law practice are also examined, such as what to do when allegations of undue influence and financial elder abuse are presented—and you drafted the documents. America's older population is growing larger and more diverse. As the Baby Boomers start reaching 65, they are expected to focus attention on issues about aging and disability. The expert faculty for this information-filled seminar gives you the tools needed to provide answers to some of those concerns. From removing sponging relatives from an elder's home to planning for community property owned by retired couples moving to Oregon, attorneys who practice elder law must be able to address a wide range of legal needs. Get the latest on legislative developments affecting elder law and an update on changes to Medicaid administrative rules. Learn how a lawyer's ethical obligations interact with medical privilege and HIPAA. And, as your clients begin to reflect the growing ethnic diversity of the aging population, gain an understanding of how to bridge differences in communication styles and cultural values.
